In the pool she sold for $160, while No. 9 sold next ($130), and the winner only brought $25, so deceived were the experts in the appearance of the horses. Time, 518.

It was reported, however, by some of the spectators, that the winner crossed Hampton, whose rider had consequently to pull him up a little, and that otherwise the latter would have won. This closed the day's aport.

To-day, the last day, is the exciting steeple chase for a purse of $600, over about three miles of fair hunting country; a sweepstake purse of $400, for three-year olds, two-mile dash, for which nine horses are entered. The third race is the Press stake, so are entered. The third race is the Press stake, so termed in compliment to the "fourth estate," a post stake purse of $70% for all ares, to carry 100 pounds, $100 entrance, play or pay. For this there are the same subscribes as in the Ferry stake, with the single exception of Mr. Morris and visitors may expect to see the largest field of horses that ever stated in a three-mile heat race in America. The programme of sport, slogether, is one of the best ever offsice in this courty, and will be likely to attrace such a crown as has not belone been seen at this course.

In the Wrong House,

I began to feel pretty considerably queer. The governor kept no male servant that I know of, and had never done so. It was impossible that be could have introduced this change into his bouse hold without my being informed of it by sister Laurs, whose letters were an exact chronicle of everything, down to the health of the cas. Thu was puzzling. And now that I had time to think the house was much too large for a family requiring only three sleeping rooms, even when I was al home. It was what is called a dout le house, with rooms on both sides of the hall; and the aparament on the threshold of which I was still linger ing, appeared, from the dim light of the windows to be of very considerable at ze. I now recollected that the quantity of plate I had seen—a portion of which at the very moment felt preternaturally heavy in my pockets—must have been three times greater than any the governor ever possessed, and that various pieces were of a size and massivenest. I had never refore seen in the evisbilishment. It vain I bethought myself that I had seen and recognized the well known door-plate, and that the area from which I entered was immediately under: it vain I argued that since Laura was about to be married, the extra quantity of plate might be intended to form part of her frousseau: I could not convince myself. But the course of my thought suggested an idea, and pulling bastily from my pocket a tablespoon. I felt, for I could not see, the legend which contained my fate. But my fluger were tremulous; they seemed to have lost souss tion—only I fancied I did feel some-bling more than the governor's plan initials. There was still a light in the hall. If I could turbing that spoos within its illumination. All was slent; and I wentered to descend step by stay—not as I had bounded up, but with the sicelity pace of a shief, and the plate growing heavier and heavier in my pocket. A tlength I was near enough to see, in spin of a dimness that had orthered over my eyes, and with a sensation of at solute fantures! I behald up on the spoon an engrave: cress—the red right hand of a baron-ti.

I crept lack again, holding by the barnisters fancying every now and ten that I heard a doc oppuing behind me, and yet me fet no more we senting to quicken it sir mot on han if I had bee pursued by a murderer in the nightmar. I a length good into the room, grouped for and ir, an asid two. No more hurry now. Oh not Therway I had love? Oh, a triffet a mire triffe. Whi had I dow? Oh, a triffet a mire triffe. Whi had I dow? Oh, a triffet a mire triffe. Whi had I rooms on both sides of the hall; and the spars ment on the threshold of which I was still linger house. I am a gontleman, with ano her gentleman's aroots in my locks. I claim the protection of the law. Police! police!

My bean was wandeling. I pressed my hand upon my wet forebead, to keep down the thicks coming lancies, and determined, for the first time in my life, to hold a deiberste consultation with myself. I was in an awkward predictment—it was impossible to deny the fact; but was there anything really serious in the case! I had unquestionably descended into the wrong area, the right hand on instead of the left hand one; but was I not as unquestionably the relation—he distant relation—he distant door neighbor? I had been four years attent from his house, and was there anything more natural than that I should desire to pay my next visit through the subterranean window? I had appropriated, it is true, a quantity of silver plate I had found; but with what other intension could I have done this than to present it to my very distant relation's daughter, and reprosch her with her care leasness in leaving it next door? Finally, I was suared, caged, trapped—door and window had been bolted upon me without any resistance on my part—and I was now some considerable time in the house, unsuarected, yet a prisoner. The position was serious; but come, suppose the worst, that I was as afressid, a distant relation of the individual next door. I belonged to nebody in the world, if not to him; I fore but an in infferent reputation in regard to stead ness; and a ter ious years' absence in a foreign country, I had returned, title, pannless, and objections, just to time to find an area window open in the dusk of the cv ning, and a heap of plate lying Lehind it within view of the street.

This self-examitation was not encouraging, the case was decidedly queer; and as I reat thus poel ing, and a heap of plate lying tehind it within view of the street.

This self-examitation was not encouraging, the case was decidedly queer; and as frat thus pool dering in the dark, with the spoons in my hald. I am quite sure that no malefactor in a sunglest could have envied my role thour. In fict, the syndence was no dead against me, that I began teldoubt my own innocence. What was I here for it my instentions had really been honest. Why snould I desire to come into any individual's area window instead of the door? And how came it that all this silver-plate had yound its way into my pockets? I was angry as well as terrified; I was angry as well as terrified; I was judge and crimmal in one; but the instincts of nature got the better of my sone of justice, and I rose sudden y up to ascertain whether it was not possible to get from the window into the street.

As I moved, however, the horrible booty I had in my pockets moved likewise, appearing to me te shrick. Blee a score of fende.

not possible to get from the window into the street.

As I moved, however, the horrible booty I had in my pockets moved likewise, appearing to me te shriek, like a score of fiends, "Police! police!" and she next instant I heard a quick footstep seconding the stair. Now was the fearly momens come! I was on my feet; my eyes glared upon the door; my bands were clenched; the perspiration had dried suddenly on my skin; and my tongue clave to the roof of my mouth. But the footstep, accompanied by a gleam of light, passed—passed; from very weakness I sat down again, with a dreadful inciderence to the streams of the plate in my pockets. Presently there were more footsteps along the hall; then voices; then drawing of bolts and creaking of locks; then utter darkness, then silence—iasting, terrible, profound. The house had gone to bed; the house would be quickly asleep; it was time to be up and doing. But first and increment I must get rid of the plate. Without that hideous corpus delecti. I should have some chance. I must as all mazarus, creep down mot the hall, find my way to the lower regions, and replace the accursed thing where I found it. I required nerve to attempt thins; but I was thoroughly wound up; and aiter adowing a reasonable time to elapse, to give my enemies a impoporumity of failing asleep, I set out upon the aitennure. The door creaker as I wont out; the plate creaked against my very sont as a decomed the steps; but slowly, shealthily, I crept along the wall; and at length tound myself, on the level foor. There was but one door on that since of the hall, the door which led to the area room—I recollect the fact districtly—and it was with mexpressible relief I reached it in aslety, and grasped the knob in my hand. The knob turnet, out the door did not open; it was not one did not pen it was locked; it was my late to be the fact districtly—and it was with mexpressible relief I reached it in aslety, and grasped the knob in my hand. The knob turnet, out the door did not open; it was ocked; it was my late to b again doggedly, reached the stair, and re-entered the spartment I had left.
